A. Draft resolution²

1. The Parliamentary Assembly refers to its Resolution 1872 (2012) on “Lives lost in the Mediterranean Sea: who is responsible”, which was the result of a thorough investigation into the responsibilities of those who could have gone to the rescue of 72 people on board a small rubber dinghy, known as the “left-to-die boat”, who set off on a trip to Europe on 26 March 2011, of which only 9 people survived.

2. Unfortunately, the catalogue of lives lost at sea did not end with this incident. More recently, in October 2013, two vessels capsized within sight of the coast of Lampedusa and led to the loss of over 400 lives. Again, two recent shipwrecks in May 2014 resulted in the deaths of dozens and still hundreds missing. These catastrophes revealed again the crucial need for Europe and the rest of the world to fill in the gaps in the legal framework, policies and practices of rescue at sea.

3. The Assembly acknowledges that important efforts by member states, Italy in particular, have been engaged towards saving more lives at sea. However, a number of concerns still remain including failures to cooperate, define and admit responsibility and learn lessons. The left-to-die incident clearly highlighted the urgent need to guarantee fundamental rights, while respecting legitimate security imperatives of border controls.

4. The Assembly therefore wants to reinforce its previous recommendations and encourage further measures to prevent communication and responsibility gaps in saving lives of people in distress in the future.

5. With a view to applying zero-tolerance towards lives lost at sea, the Assembly further recommends that member states:

5.1. with regard to rescue at sea and lives lost:

5.1.1. adopt clear, binding and enforceable common standards with regard to search and rescue operations, including disembarkation, fully consistent with international maritime law, international human rights and refugee law obligations;

5.1.2. work towards extending the recently adopted rules for the surveillance of the European Union external sea borders in the context of the operations of the European Agency for the Management of Operational Cooperation at the External Borders of the Member States of the European Union (Frontex), to national operations outside the framework of Frontex operations;

5.1.3. commit to improving the recording and identification of migrants who die and disappear at sea, and ensure survivors and relatives of the victims have prompt access to information on those lost at sea;

5.1.4. ensure family links are maintained or restored following rescue operations;

5.1.5. commit to swiftly, independently and thoroughly investigating any reported failures to rescue people at sea and ensure accountability;

5.1.6. commit to assisting coastal states to increase resources for search and rescue operations;

5.2. with regard to criminalisation of irregular migration:

5.2.1. end all disincentives for private vessels to conduct rescues by ensuring that the people rescued will be allowed to land quickly and by ending the threat of prosecution on charges of aiding and abetting irregular immigration which creates moral and financial damages;

- 5.2.2. urge shipmasters and fishermen to comply with their obligations under international law to assist and report to the relevant authorities of the member states any migrant boats in distress;
 - 5.2.3. ensure financial compensation of shipmasters and fishermen for possible financial losses caused by rescue operations;
 - 5.3. with regard to push-back practices:
 - 5.3.1. end all push-back practices and ensure that practices of rescue at sea are compliant with the right to seek asylum and the right to be protected against refoulement;
 - 5.3.2. ensure the credibility of any judicial probe or investigation into push-back incidents by providing it with sufficient independence, impartiality and transparency ;
 - 5.3.3. publicly condemn any occurrence of summary removals and collective expulsions of which they become aware and ensure accountability for any such incident;
 - 5.3.4. ensure in particular that any accelerated asylum procedures and the assessment of personal circumstances in the context of search and rescue operations respect one's right to be protected from refoulement, in line with the Council of Europe 2009 Guidelines on human rights protection in the context of accelerated asylum procedures; ensure that all those intercepted have access to individual procedures to seek international protection or raise other protection needs, and have access to an effective remedy against any decision to return;
 - 5.3.5. ensure that any bilateral readmission agreement is drafted and implemented in a manner fully consistent with international human rights and refugee law standards and includes effective safeguards of human rights and access to an individualised fair and effective assessment.
 - 5.4. With regard to the left-to-die boat incident:
 - 5.4.1. fully cooperate to find answers to the outstanding questions, by informing the rapporteur swiftly and adequately about the location of their vessels during the time the boat in question was drifting in search for help, and the messages their vessels have received;
 - 5.4.2. grant the right to residence for the survivors whose applications for asylum or residence on humanitarian grounds are still pending;
 - 5.5. show further solidarity with third countries by giving more refugees access to resettlement or temporary reception programmes, and guarantee a safe journey to protection.
6. With a view to encouraging the creation of safe legal channels and preventing irregular migrants, asylum seekers and refugees from undertaking risk-full journeys to Europe, and to sharing the responsibility for asylum seekers inside the European Union (EU), the Assembly recommends that the EU:
 - 6.1. encourages its member states to increase resettlement quotas for persons in need of international protection and adopt a common approach to humanitarian visas; explores further possibilities to protected entries and open legal channels which enable migrants to reach Europe in a regular manner;
 - 6.2. takes steps to further harmonise the common asylum standards and procedures in the EU, by, for example, considering a joint EU processing of asylum applications and the creation of a uniform asylum status; explores further possibilities to reinforce solidarity for asylum seekers and refugees within the EU;

6.3. strengthens Regional Protection Programmes and ensures their sustainability thanks to sufficient funding; supports neighbouring countries in improving their asylum and protection systems through mobility partnerships, and makes further cooperation on migration and border control dependent on a sufficient level of protection for asylum seekers in these countries;

6.4. ensures that Frontex makes the protection of fundamental rights a priority of its joint operations, and seeks namely the ability – which is still lacking in the recently adopted regulation - to apply rules (on search and rescue, disembarkation and non-refoulement) on migrant boats within the territorial waters of third states which clearly cannot meet their international obligations regarding search and rescue at sea nor uphold the rights of irregular migrants, asylum-seekers and refugees;

6.5. ensures that Frontex establishes an effective mechanism for individual complaints on violations of fundamental rights, in order to improve its accountability;

6.6. ensures that the mechanism of the European border Surveillance System (EUROSUR) contributes to protecting and saving lives at the EU's external borders;

6.7. adopts measures to prohibit penal sanctions on private vessels carrying out SAR operations and to compensate private vessels when they face economic loss after engaging in rescue operations;

6.8. sets up a proper system of data collection of the mortal remains of lives lost in the Mediterranean and make it swiftly accessible to relatives.

7. The Assembly recommends NATO to:

7.1 take into account possible movements of persons in need of international protection in all NATO operations and reach agreements with all countries concerned to ensure that persons in need of international protection are cared for;

7.2 ensure that all NATO assets are equipped with Global Maritime Distress and Safety Systems, in any of its versions, and have the means to receive Hydrolant messages;

7.3 publish the results of the lessons learned process in which it has been examining ways to strengthen information sharing and procedures related to Search and Rescue at Sea during NATO-led operations.

8 The Assembly believes that the International Maritime Organisation (IMO) should play a role to promote a common application of the legal framework of rescue at sea, as different approaches still today create excessive delays and failures to rescue people in distress at sea. To this end, it recommends the IMO to step up its efforts with a view to elaborating a regional Memorandum of Understanding on procedures to facilitate the disembarkation of persons rescued in the Mediterranean Sea.

B. Draft recommendation³

1. The Parliamentary Assembly refers to its Resolution  (2014) on the left-to-die boat: actions and reactions.
2. The left-to-die boat tragedy and other recent incidents that led to the loss of lives of hundreds of children, women and men need to trigger a radical change in Search and Rescue (SAR) policies and practices in Europe. Serious challenges have arisen from a lack of accountability, transparency and coordination. The Assembly considers that the Council of Europe has an important role to play in assisting member states in this respect.
3. With a view to preventing the human rights violations which result from the vacuum of responsibility in search and rescue and disembarkation, and to safeguarding solidarity among the member states, the Assembly calls on the Committee of Ministers to:
 - 3.1. instruct the Steering Committee on Human Rights (CDDH) to carry out a feasibility study on a common approach to fill crucial gaps in the legal framework on Search and Rescue in the Mediterranean Sea, namely the definition of distress, the obligation to respond immediately to a distress call, irrespective of the SAR zone the call comes from, the criteria for which member states are responsible for disembarkation, the abolition of disincentives for shipmasters and fishermen to conduct rescues;
 - 3.2. on the basis of this feasibility study, hold a thematic debate, with the participation of the Parliamentary Assembly, on the above-mentioned issues, on finding safe routes for persons in need of international protection (through resettlement and other types of protected entries), as well as solidarity mechanisms for EU states to share the responsibility for those rescued (such as relocation and joint processing of asylum requests in or outside Europe), in order to exchange best practices and offer solutions, and to find ways to facilitate agreements between states facing regular disputes on the coordination of rescue at sea and disembarkation;
 - 3.3. adopt guidelines on how to comply with the Hirsi Jamaa and Others v. Italy judgment of the European Court of Human Rights and urge member states to refrain from push backs.

C. Explanatory Memorandum by Ms Tineke Strik, rapporteur

1. Introduction

1. In 2011, I was asked to look into the circumstances surrounding the tragic deaths of 63 women, men and children left adrift in a boat off the coast of Europe for 15 days in March/April 2011.

2. In April 2012, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe adopted Resolution 1872 (2012) on "Lives lost in the Mediterranean Sea: who is responsible?".⁴ With many essential questions remaining unanswered even now, the tendency has been to shift the blame elsewhere and obscure the issue of who was responsible. No entity emerges with honour.

3. As I concluded in my report, the "left-to-die boat" tragedy was clearly a collective failure at every step of the way and by all key actors. Despite heavy criticism against the failures to cooperate, admit responsibility and learn lessons, it took even further tragic events towards the end of 2013 and mid-2014 for any concerted action to be seen to be taken.

4. In October 2013, two particularly grave incidents attracted worldwide attention to the issue. Two vessels capsized off the coast of Lampedusa within 9 days of each other, with over 400 fatalities.⁵ Again in April and May 2014, dozens of migrants drowned at sea and hundreds are still missing.

5. This report aims at clarifying the steps that have been taken after the adoption of Resolution 1872 (2012). I take this opportunity to thank all authorities, stakeholders and individuals who have shared valuable contributions to the report.

2. The left-to-die boat: missing answers to the investigation

6. Notwithstanding continuing enquiries, from myself and others, central questions that I had identified in my April 2012 report still remain without answer. To my further enquiries I received denials, referrals back to NATO and/or the member states, or, in some cases, no answer at all. Not having the legal standing, in particular as these questions involved military matters, it was not possible for me to compel answers. Legal cases and Freedom of Information applications are being pursued in a number of the member states implicated but seem in vain.

2.1. Responsibility under NATO command

7. In Resolution 1872 (2012), the Assembly had highlighted the lack of clarity as regards the responsibility of and for vessels under NATO command in respect of effecting rescues at sea.

8. Since April 2012, the Assembly has still never received comprehensive information on the involvement of respective assets in NATO and participating member states.⁶

9. On the eve of the plenary debate in Strasbourg on 24th April 2012, I received a letter from NATO (see appendix) informing me that the NATO had not declared a "military zone" in the Mediterranean and therefore had no overall coordination role for Search and Rescue (SAR) Operations in the area of the incident.

10. I was surprised to read that NATO did not hold satellite imagery that could help "identify military, merchant or other ships in the area [...] because satellite imagery was not used by NATO to develop Maritime Situational Awareness in support of [the] UN-mandated embargo operation [...] or to create a Recognized Maritime Picture" (RMP). It is furthermore disappointing to read that the current RMP tool used by NATO in certain circumstances has no recording capability.

See also Committee on Migration, Refugees and Displaced Persons, The arrival of large numbers of irregular migrants to Italian coastal areas as a result of tensions in the southern Mediterranean countries, Rapporteur Christopher Chope (United Kingdom, EDG), 2014.

11. NATO informed me that at the time of the incident “only eight vessels in the Mediterranean were under NATO command, covering an operations area of over 61,000 square nautical miles”. NATO also confirmed that “helicopters from ships under NATO command were flying in the general area of the migrant boat”. Yet, there is no data that would allow the helicopter to be identified.

12. NATO confirmed that the Spanish frigate “Mendez Nuñez”, under NATO Command, was approximately 24 nautical miles away, and “conducted [an unsuccessful] search in a an area of 60nm following an instruction received on the morning of 28 March from the ITS ETNA”. The ITS Borsini was said to be 37 nautical miles away from the position given.

13. I remain very sceptic at NATO’s statement that not all military vessels during NATO operations are “equipped with Global Maritime Distress and Safety System” (GMDSS), in any of its versions, or have the means to receive Hydrolant messages. The standards for tactical communications systems which vessels must have when operating as part of a NATO-led force on operations or during training and exercises do not include requirements for civilian communications systems such as INMARSAT.

14. I am further concerned to read that neither the ships nor the “Maritime Command Naples did receive any further messages from Maritime Rescue Coordination Centre (MRCC) Rome on the boat in question” in addition to the 27 March distress call.

15. NATO has said they “continue to actively review [their] records in order to ascertain what happened”. The work is apparently ongoing. Although they have engaged in a “comprehensive” lessons learned process, in which they have been “examining ways by which [they] could strengthen [NATO] information sharing and procedures related to SAR at Sea during NATO-led operations”, I have no further details on the actual content of the process.

16. There are worrying information gaps which still prevent our Assembly from getting a comprehensive overview on which information regarding the distress call was shared with whom. It is still unclear which communication system the allied partners used, and how it can be possible to communicate if certain communication systems are not obligatory.

2.2. Enquiries by national parliaments and governments

17. The further responses I received after the adoption of Resolution 1872 from Italy, Spain and the United Kingdom (see appendix) still don’t allow me to ascertain the facts and responsibilities of the left-to-die boat incident.

18. Member states participating in the NATO coordinated operation should fully cooperate with the Assembly in order to get clarity on which actors were involved in the reported left-to-die boat. Although I have received replies from nearly all countries I have addressed, I urge the United States (USA) to reply to the outstanding questions and the parliamentarians of France, Greece, Italy, Romania, Spain, Turkey and the UK should press their governments to provide full information, if necessary by means of their inquiry competences.

19. The Italian Senate’s Special Commission on the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights convened a hearing in July 2012, during which I presented the Assembly’s concerns. However, no concrete results followed.

2.3. European parliament inquiries on responsibilities

20. During the presentation of my findings in the Committee on Civil Liberties, Justice and Home Affairs (LIBE) of the European Parliament, I urged the members of Parliament to cooperate in getting access to relevant sources, such as satellite information. Unfortunately, no action has been undertaken. Therefore, there was no follow-up to the letter of the High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs & Security Policy/Vice-President of the European Commission, Ms Catherine Ashton, in which she answered that she had no relevant satellite imagery available.

21. It is still relevant and crucial to get hold on satellite imagery of that period and that specific area. It is hard to believe that these images do not exist.

2.4. National legal proceedings

22. With support from Non-Governmental Organisations (NGOs), in particular that of the International Federation for Human Rights (FIDH), cases have been brought before the courts in Italy, France, Spain and Belgium, and Freedom of Information (Fol) applications filed in Canada, the United Kingdom (UK) and the USA.

23. The initial case brought in the Tribunal de Grand Instance in France in April 2012, for failure to come to the rescue of persons in peril, was dropped by the public prosecutor in December 2012 on the advice of the Ministry of Defence.

24. A second case, a civil action, was brought under article 86 of the French Code of Criminal Procedure in June 2013 by two survivors supported by three NGOs. The judge dismissed this second case on the grounds that 'exhaustive investigations by prestigious international bodies' had been unable to uncover evidence of French responsibility and, in any case, French ships were not in the area of the drifting boat nor were French aircraft charged with surveillance of this part of the sea. On 11 December 2013, the claimants gave notice of appeal against this decision.

25. A civil action was also initiated in Spain in June 2013 in the names of the same two survivors. In November 2013, the lawyer bringing the case was informed that the case had been rejected in light of a report from the Spanish Navy to the effect that the Spanish vessel Mendez Nuñez had not been close enough to the migrants' boat. This decision was also appealed.

26. A criminal case was filed in Belgium at the end of November 2013, before the Brussels Tribunal of First Instance, in the name of three of the survivors.

27. The Fol requests by Canada, the UK and the USA concerned the movement of ships in the Mediterranean at the time of the incident.⁷ As of the time of writing, Canada had responded in part to the request for information, while indicating that military secrecy prevents further revelations; the information provided sheds no further light on the 2011 incident. The United Kingdom and the United States had not responded.

28. Regarding the survivors of the Left-to-die boat whose applications for asylum or residence on humanitarian grounds are still pending, I urge the member states they reside in to grant them the right to residence.

3. Lessons learned from tragedies in the Mediterranean: are there any?

29. I hope that one day the details will come to light so that appropriate lessons can be drawn from this tragic failure to act. In the meantime, I stand by my conclusion that one State's vessel under the command of NATO must take responsibility. I trust that this will be fully taken into account in any lessons learned exercises. National and international initiatives have given some food for hope, yet there's a long road to go until deaths and push-backs are fully stopped in the Mediterranean.

3.1. Italy

30. In July 2012, in execution of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) judgment of *Hirsi Jamaa and others v. Italy*⁸, Italy informed the Committee of Ministers that its bilateral agreement with Libya for the return of migrants intercepted at sea had been suspended in the wake of the 2011 conflict. The government underlined that any individuals intercepted in the future would be taken to special centres in Italy to assess their situation in full respect of their Convention rights⁹. Until recently, it was not clear if this also meant that Italy respected the maritime rule that each request for help should be followed up immediately.

⁸ ECtHR judgment in the case of Hirsi Jamaa and others v. Italy (Application no. 27765/09, 23 February 2012).

31. The change in the Italian government in April 2013 gave hope for a resolution of the problem in line with international human rights and refugee law. The appointed Prime Minister Enrico Letta expressed shame at the harsh immigration laws brought in by the previous coalition government, including those intended to dissuade people from helping vessels in trouble. Political realities, on the other hand, it was said, made their repeal difficult. Then 2013 and 2014 saw another upsurge in boats arriving from the African coast. The new Italian Prime Minister, Matteo Renzi, appointed in February 2014 confirmed that the Mediterranean would be considered at the heart of priorities of the Italian presidency of the European Union.

32. On 3 October 2013, a boat that had set off from Libya packed with more than 500 Eritrean and some Somali men, women and children caught fire and capsized off Lampedusa. Only 155 people survived; some 366 bodies, men, women and children, were later recovered. Incidents were now occurring on a regular basis, but a tragedy of such magnitude provoked universal shock and horror and could not be ignored. I called for an immediate investigation into allegations that fishing or other boats failed to go to the rescue of drowning persons off the island of Lampedusa.¹⁰

33. Just one week later, on 11 October 2013, another stricken vessel sank 65 nautical miles South East of Lampedusa, in an area where Malta has SAR responsibility. The boat sank as Libyan soldiers had shot holes in it, in order to prevent them from departing Libya. It seems that at least 34 people died.¹¹ In the end, both Italian and Maltese SAR teams came to the rescue, and managed to save more than 200 Syrian refugees. But delays were reported in their going to the assistance of the sinking boat¹².

34. These delays once again appeared to be the result of, in the first place, a back and forth between Italy and Malta over who should take responsibility for the rescue and, in the second, that the rescue signals sent out did not have the urgency needed to trigger immediate assistance. Sadly, if the failures identified more than a year ago had not been repeated, possibly many more lives could have been saved.

35. Noting the urgent need to tackle the situation while European discussions were still on-going, Italy launched Operation Mare Nostrum which, according to Former Defence Minister Mario Mauro, is a “humanitarian operation” to “save human lives”, as well as a “security” one¹³. On 18 October 2013, Italy tripled its naval and air units working in the Straits of Sicily.¹⁴ The operation which has been successful in saving thousands of lives since it was launched will be short lived unless Europe manages to provide the means to make it sustainable. Other southern states including Greece, Portugal, Spain and Malta have also called for greater support from the EU in patrolling the Mediterranean.

36. Since Mare Nostrum, Italy seems to have adopted a new approach and has interpreted distress situation in a very broad sense and provided prompt rescue. However, the Italian replies to my questions imply that Italy doesn't admit that according to maritime law states have to act immediately upon distress calls, regardless if the request comes from the state's SAR zone or another SAR zone. The obligation to coordinate or start a rescue action only comes to an end if the responsible SAR authority has taken over this task. The reasoning behind this maritime rule is simple: every minute counts when lives are at stake at sea. Italy should admit that the maritime rules impose an immediate action to every distress call, no matter where the call comes from.

37. No-one could now deny that meaningful steps needed urgently to be taken, and yet little attention was paid to what became of the survivors of these disasters. In January 2014, it was revealed that a number of them were held in a reception centre on Lampedusa for more than 100 days. This was a basic and often hugely overstretched first-tier reception centre where new arrivals are supposed to spend no longer than 48 hours. UNHCR protested to judicial authorities over what it said amounted to a prolonged detention of people in urgent need of assistance. MP Khalid Chaouki, who spent Christmas inside the centre, said the contrast was strong between the treatment given to the survivors of the 3 October disaster and the torrent of expressions of solidarity immediately after it. UNHCR demanded that the Italian authorities ensure the situation never happens again. Today, the centre in Lampedusa is being renovated, and no migrants are currently being kept on the island.

3.2. Malta

38. In August 2013, the Italian authorities asked two commercial ships, the MV Salamis and the Adakent, to go to the aid of two groups of migrants in distress off the Libyan coast – Libya being still unable to carry out its responsibility for its SAR zone. The Adakent was instructed directly by the Libyan authorities, and the MV Salamis by the MRCC Rome on behalf of the Libyans, to transport the migrants back to Libya and disembark them in the port of Tripoli. The Adakent did as instructed. After rescuing 102 migrants from a boat about 45 nautical miles off the Libyan coast, the MV Salamis, a Greek-owned tanker, however, refused to return them and instead continued on its route to Malta. The Government of Malta informed the tanker's captain that he would not be allowed to disembark the migrants in Malta, and as the Salamis approached the island, the Armed Forces of Malta blocked it. The ship found itself at an impasse as Italy and Malta both refused to disembark the migrants.

39. On 6 August 2013, European Commissioner Malmström ordered Malta to allow the migrants to disembark in view of the urgent humanitarian needs of the passengers. This did not happen. Malta's National Security Minister stated: "As a sovereign state, we cannot give in to the barefaced breach of international law by this captain."¹⁵ The Attorney General wrote to the local agent of the tanker holding him responsible for any damages Malta might suffer as a consequence of these events. After three days of impasse, on 7 August, the Italian authorities accepted to allow the Salamis to disembark the 102 migrants in the port of Syracuse.

40. These cases raise two very troubling issues. Firstly, that the migrants were being given no chance to claim asylum and were being put at risk of being returned to a dangerous situation; the Libyan coast from which they had sailed could not have been considered for them a "place of safety" within the meaning of the International Convention on Maritime SAR. Secondly, being stalled at sea for several days not only threatens the health and well-being of the rescued migrants, but has also a damaging economic impact for the commercial vessel. These delays in disembarkation therefore increase the risk that private boats get more hesitant when it comes to rescuing migrants at sea.

3.3. Greece

41. In November 2013, the NGO ProAsyl reported about the fatal consequences of the closing of the land border in the Evros region of Greece, which, after August 2012, led to a shift in flight routes to the Aegean Sea route, and reports of illegal push-backs of refugees from Syria, Afghanistan, Somalia and Eritrea increased, from Greek territorial waters, the Greek islands and from the land border.¹⁶ The report describes how those apprehended are ill-treated before being deported back to Turkey. Amnesty International¹⁷ and Human Rights Watch (HRW) have also interviewed refugees who have similar experiences. Special units of the Greek coastguard, the ProAsyl report says, abandon refugees in Turkish territorial waters without consideration for their safety: at least 149 people, most Syrian and Afghan refugees, lost their lives in this stretch of water.

42. Since the beginning of 2014, at least 43 people have died trying to reach the Greek coasts. On 20 January 2014, nine children and three women lost their lives when their vessel sank near a Greek island while being towed by the Greek Coast Guard.¹⁸

43. Faced with mounting criticism from, among others, the Council of Europe¹⁹, UNHCR, NGOs and political parties, as well as EU Commissioner Malmström, Greek Merchant Marine Minister Miltiadis Varvitsiotis ordered a judicial probe into the incident. Although the independence and impartiality of such an investigation is of crucial importance, the lack of transparency makes it impossible to monitor the investigation and the methods used. NGOs have urged the minister to lift the boat and to search for the drowned bodies.

44. In addition, during a meeting in February this year with UNHCR and NGOs working in Greece, I was informed about numerous signals and evidence that Greece is practicing push-backs to Turkey on a structural basis.²⁰ I have expressed my concerns to Minister Dendias about these allegations from reliable sources. As this would mean a serious violation of the non-refoulement principle, a thorough investigation on these incidents is urgently needed. Nevertheless, more deaths at sea have been reported since then²¹: according to Amnesty International as a result of further attempts of the Greek authorities to push migrants back to Turkey.

45. The sealing of the land border between Greece and Turkey was carried out in cooperation with the EU and EU border agency Frontex. "These are European borders, managed with European money, and with the support of Frontex," said the European Council on Refugees and Exiles (ECRE) Secretary General Michael Diedring. "The EU has a responsibility to take all measures needed to ensure that life is given priority and fundamental rights are respected at its borders."²² Having assumed the presidency of the European Union in January 2014, it is all the more important that Greece shows proper leadership in this regard.

4. A European policy on migration, asylum and the duty to rescue in the Mediterranean

46. During the presentation of my findings to the European Parliament (EP), I proposed that the Parliament should take the initiative for what I called a "pact on the Mediterranean", meaning an EU protocol for the Mediterranean region, tackling the various factors that cause rescuing and protection gaps. The practice of failure, I addressed in my report, still occurs. It is a missed opportunity that the EP did not follow-up my suggestion to propose this pact. Instead, it left it up to the European Council after the recent catastrophes. The proposals of the EU Task force Mediterranean (TFM), set up in October 2013, offer member states some tools and methods to improve their policy and practice, but a pact formulated by the EP might have been stronger on human rights and less security oriented.²³ Of course, it is not too late for the EP to make sure that the EU response guarantees compliance with fundamental rights.

when the boat capsized. The Greek Port Authority, on the other hand, maintained that it was towing the boat toward a Greek island when a large number of those on board gathered on one side, causing it to sink. See UNHCR, Statement on boat incident off Greece coast, 21 January 2014.

4.1. Will European action match the level of its words?

47. The European Council discussed Migration Flows at its meeting of 24-25 October 2013.²⁴ Expressing its deep sadness at the October 2013 dramatic deaths of hundreds of people in the Mediterranean Sea near Lampedusa, which, it said “shocked all Europeans”, the Council agreed that determined action should be taken in order to prevent the loss of lives at sea and to avoid that such human tragedies from happening again. It welcomed the setting up of the TFM with the purpose of developing a range of measures to be taken in this respect. The TFM, chaired by the European Commission, met twice, with participants including the European External Action Service, member states, the European Asylum Support Office (EASO), Frontex, Europol, the Fundamental Rights Agency (FRA) and the European Maritime Safety Agency (EMSA).²⁵ It reported to the European Parliament and European Council in December 2013.²⁶

48. The TFM set out some 38 operational activities to be followed. All of these, the communication says, “will have to be fully compliant with international human rights standards.” Yet, the emphasis throughout is on preventing persons from attempting to enter the EU through irregular channels, from putting their own lives at risk by undertaking dangerous journeys towards Europe. The proposed measures range from strengthened cooperation with the neighbouring transit countries (on border controls, readmission, the combat against smuggling and trafficking and access to asylum) and a strengthened role for Frontex to the exploration of further possibilities for ‘protected entries’ in the EU for persons in need of international protection.

49. The TFM urged in particular the member states to make more use of humanitarian visas, relocation or resettlement programmes, but also proposed to carry out a feasibility study on joint processing outside the EU without prejudice to the existing right of access to asylum procedures in the EU. Most of the member states however rejected the idea of a more pro-active invitation policy. Commissioner Malmström stated at an inter-parliamentary meeting in Athens, February 2014 that she could not start a pilot on joint processing outside the EU, as member states were not prepared to accept and admit those who would be recognised refugees.

50. Yet, the proposals of the Commission to create protected entries to Europe for those in need of international protection need urgently to be embraced to show adequate signs of solidarity with refugees and with the neighbouring countries of conflict regions (especially now Lebanon, Jordan and Turkey)²⁷ fearing for violence and forced returns, and thus, getting prepared to take the risk of a dangerous journey to a safer place. The use of Evacuation Transit Centres could help process the cases to European member states or non-European countries.

51. The Communication of the TFM addresses the problem of low human rights standards in transit countries, but it does not propose to first require an adequate protection level (regarding non-refoulement, access to asylum and protection mechanisms, non-discrimination, access to services and dignity) before cooperation on migration with these countries is allowed. The need for this requirement has earlier been stressed by the UN special rapporteur on the human rights of migrants, François Crépeau.²⁸

52. I welcome the two mobility partnerships concluded with Tunisia and Morocco, and the one being negotiated with Jordan, in the context of the Global Approach to Migration and Mobility (GAMM). This GAMM consists of 4 pillars: legal migration and mobility; the impact of migration on development; combating irregular migration and human trafficking; international protection and asylum policy. This cooperation with third countries has been criticized for resulting in even harsher policies towards migrants in the transit countries, while these countries have gained an interest in avoiding responsibility for migrants and in making sure that migrants don't reach the EU borders.²⁹ In order to avoid these perverse incentives, the pillar on 'international protection and asylum policy' should be given priority. The establishment of a sufficient protection level should serve as a condition for the cooperation on the other three pillars. Furthermore, the GAMM should aim at sharing the responsibility for refugees and therefore also create secure legal avenues to Europe for those seeking protection,

53. Furthermore, the Dublin-regulation³⁰ de facto discourages the Southern member states to improve their standards on reception and procedures for asylum seekers, and thus threatens the aim of a Common European Asylum System. In its proposal on the post-Stockholm programme, the Commission put forward the creation of a uniform asylum status.³¹ Such status would reinforce the mutual trust in the national asylum decisions, but also facilitate intra-EU mobility. This right to mobility offers refugees and subsidiary protected persons the opportunity to choose their place of settlement, creating a natural type of solidarity.

54. At the same time, the EU could improve and further harmonise the application of the Asylum Acquis by starting a pilot on joint processing inside the EU, by offering sufficient support to member states who currently lack adequate protection standards and by encouraging the European Commission to start infringement procedures.

55. To what extent the proposals of the TFM will be adopted and how they serve to reduce the risk of further tragedies, still remains to be seen. Moreover, the Council put off further discussion of asylum and migration issues until June 2014.

4.2. A strengthened role for Frontex and EUROSUR

56. The TFM called in particular for increased support and assistance to member states in the region and reinforcement of Frontex activities in the Mediterranean.

57. "Swift implementation by member states of the new European Border Surveillance System (EUROSUR) will be crucial," the Council had concluded in October, "to help detecting vessels and illegal entries, contributing to protecting and saving lives at the EU's external borders." This became operational as of 2 December 2013 with an estimated cost of 244 million euros until 2020.

58. "Reinforcement of Frontex-coordinated border surveillance operations by member states' airborne and naval military assets [...] can also improve situational awareness and the capacity for early detection of irregular migrants at sea, thus enabling more effective prevention of loss of life." The TFM further proposed to intensify the monitoring of known departure points for irregular migration in the whole of the Mediterranean, including parts of the coasts that serve as hubs for irregular migrants.

59. It can however be doubted if more exchange of information leads to more SAR actions. My report gives reason for some scepticism as it has clearly shown that the knowledge of the distress call and the location of the left-to-die boat, did not lead to search and rescue. If the lack of political will is not tackled, the increase of information could also have the opposite effect, namely more deterrent actions or even push-backs.

60. Moreover, if it is sincerely intended to protect and save lives, as well as prevent irregular migration and tackle cross-border crime, EUROSUR needs to operate on the basis of clear, binding and enforceable standards on the rules of engagement with respect to detection, interception, rescue operations and disembarkation; a wider concept of distress consistent with the EU Frontex rules, agreed criteria for determining where people who are rescued will land, consistent with the right to seek asylum; and a clear commitment to respect the rights of migrants and asylum seekers. In order to improve its accountability and in line with the recommendation of the EU Ombudsman, Frontex should establish an effective mechanism for individual complaints on violations of fundamental rights.³²

61. The regulation on Frontex-coordinated sea border operations which was adopted by the Council of the EU on 13 May 2014 will partly fill these gaps.³³ This regulation however only applies to these joint operations, therefore I recommend to apply the norms in this regulation to all SAR actions by individual member states and make sure that the individual assessment on safe return to a third country, which cannot be made properly on high seas, takes place on the EU territory.

62. Moreover, the new regulation will not be limited to the detection of attempts at irregular border crossing but equally extends to the interception of ships suspected of trying to gain entry to the Union without submitting to border checks as well as the search and rescue during a sea operation.

63. I welcome in particular the efforts of the EP to define clearly in the Regulation the concept of a “vessel or persons on board in a phase of distress”. The rules state that “Member States shall observe their obligation to render assistance to any vessel or person in distress at sea”. Yet, I call on Frontex to ensure that the margin for interpretation of the line drawn between the phases of alert and distress and possible errors are accompanied by appropriate safeguards.

64. The Agency’s operational plan, which shall be carried out in accordance with international law and fundamental rights³⁴ should also “include procedures ensuring that persons with international protection needs, victims of trafficking in human beings, unaccompanied minors and other vulnerable persons are identified and provided with appropriate assistance, including access to international protection”. This assessment, however, can take place during the operation at sea. It can be questioned if this can be defined as a meaningful assessment, if important safeguards such as legal aid are not in place, let alone an effective remedy against a negative decision. Despite the gaps with regard to sufficient guarantees, the regulation allows Frontex and the member states to let a migrant disembark at a third country.

65. The new Frontex rules recall the need for “cooperation with neighbouring third countries [...] to prevent unauthorised border crossings, to counter cross-border criminality and to avoid loss of life at sea.” While efforts will be made to strengthen the capacity for SAR in North Africa, at present these capacities remain weak. It will therefore be essential at least in short term that European Rescue Coordination Centres are immediately contacted when boats in distress at sea are identified in order to have a timely start of rescue operations. Looking back to the experience of 2011 with regard to the Libyan SAR zone, the importance of clearly delineating responsibilities in such circumstances becomes immediately apparent.

4.3. Calls for solutions to the Mediterranean tragedies

66. A large number of NGOs, international and local, have continued to follow this issue in all its aspects, pursuing individual initiatives as well as working in coalition to strategize collectively and bring pressure to bear in Brussels and in the countries concerned, many exchanging information under the umbrella of Boats for People and through the Web site Watch the Med and projects such as the Migrants’ files. Their commitment to these issues and untiring work deserves recognition.

67. Soon after the October 2013 tragedies, UNHCR called for immediate strengthening of the central Mediterranean’s search and rescue at sea capabilities. In a Proposal for a Central Mediterranean Sea Initiative³⁵, the UNHCR addressed those gaps it saw remaining as regards responsibilities for disembarkation. “Differing views on disembarkation are directly linked to the question of which state or states would carry longer-term responsibility for the provision of asylum.” It called for the reinforcement of SAR patrols along Mediterranean routes, greater practical cooperation between EU member states and support from the International Maritime Organisation (IMO), support for shipmasters of commercial vessels carrying out rescues, and further guidance for shipmasters³⁶ and within Frontex operational plans on what constitutes a distress situation.

68. Amnesty International continued to press for answers in relation to the Salamis and Adakent incidents as well as the October 2013 and more recent shipwrecks, issued public statements, op-ed pieces and news releases on how the EU could best avoid further loss of lives, and has focused attention on “push-backs” and the need for Europe to stop “outsourcing” migration to places, such as Libya and Egypt, where there are no human rights safeguards.

69. Human Rights Watch issued a number of publications on migrant deaths in the Mediterranean and set out concrete recommendations on how Europe should respond. Among others, the European NGO Platform on Asylum and Migration, comprising some 26 Europe-based NGOs, looking ahead to the discussions put off until June 2014, has prepared a statement setting out key priorities for the future of European migration and asylum policy.³⁷

5. Steps to be taken

70. The lessons learned process of this report highlights further specific steps which still remain to be taken by member states, NATO and the IMO.

5.1. Improve NATO working methods

71. NATO expressed its deep concern over the reports of migrants dying at sea and reaffirmed that ships under its command would always respond to vessels in distress, as is their duty under the law of the sea. The Assembly’s report, it confirmed, was being used as input into a Lessons Learned process aimed at making improvements in working methods such that loss of life could be avoided in future.

72. The NATO-led Operation Unified Protector, which had a number of ships in the Mediterranean Sea in March/April 2011, came to an end in October 2011. Currently, the Organisation has a Standing NATO Maritime Group (SNMG) in the Mediterranean. One would trust that the SNMG, and any future operations, will adjust their procedures in light of this exercise.

73. NATO explained that not all military vessels would have the Global Maritime Distress and Safety System (GMDSS), in any of its versions, equipment installed or have the means to receive Hydrolant messages. As long as this is not obligatory, it is unlikely that they would. Nonetheless, such ships would have sophisticated communications equipment that would permit reception of distress signals. The IMO, which is the UN agency responsible for safety at sea, including oversight of the SOLAS³⁸ and SAR Conventions, had in 2010 launched a scoping exercise to establish whether there was a need to review the Global Maritime Distress and Safety System (GMDSS) and in what respects.

5.2. Clarify responsibilities in search and rescue

74. In investigating the incident of March-April 2011, I was confronted with major conflicting opinions as to who was considered to have primary responsibility to react to distress calls. In subsequent incidents, this always appeared to be a critical contributing factor. In seeking clarification of a number of key questions I had identified, I continued to receive referrals back to NATO by individual member states, and referrals back to the member states by NATO. To my mind there was no clear allocation or acceptance of responsibility, at least insofar as human rights obligations were concerned.

75. Disagreements between Malta and Italy – the one geographically closer to effect a rescue, the other having primary responsibility for the zone in question – appear to continue to arise regularly, resulting in long delays in any intervention. Coordination between the SAR operations needs considerable improvement if lives are to be saved and I expect Italy to make good use of its presidency of EU during the next term to show political will in solving such wrangle with Malta.

76. As EUROSUR now begins its operations to improve surveillance and coordination among EU member states in the Mediterranean, it is crucial to set out clearly where primary responsibility for action resides within the EUROSUR network and between the national coordination centres.

77. It is important to know to what extent the EUROSUR system with its national coordination centres for border surveillance will safeguard swift and adequate responses to migrants in distress in the Mediterranean Sea and full accountability of the actors involved.

78. Furthermore, the Regulation on Frontex-coordinated sea border operations contains certain rules on interception, distress calls and disembarkation. I reiterate that the rules could fill certain gaps if member states would also apply them to national interception and SAR operations.

5.3. Encourage search and rescue by private vessels

79. In this respect, it is essential to allay fishermen's fears that they may face trouble if they rescue migrants. Yet, the national legislation in some member states, which penalises the support of irregular entrance, has not yet been repealed.³⁹ This means that private companies or persons, who help migrants in distress at sea, still may face an act of prosecution. This legislation should be abolished as soon as possible.

80. In its December 2013 communication, the European Commission's TFM proposed that a call should be issued at the national level, urging shipmasters of merchant vessels and fishermen to comply with their obligations under international law (UNCLOS, SOLAS and SAR Conventions), to assist and report to the relevant authorities of the member states any migrant boats in distress. This, the TFM said, should be coupled with a public reassurance that they will always be allowed to disembark rapidly, and that, "provided they are acting in good faith, they would not face any negative legal consequences for providing such assistance."⁴⁰ The recent Frontex rules favour again the protection of shipmasters and crew from facing "criminal penalties for the sole reason of having rescued persons in distress and brought them to a place of safety".

81. In its 2012 resolution, the Assembly had additionally highlighted the need to deal with the economic consequences for the rescuing vessel and its owners. The case of the MV Salamis, reported above, provides a very clear illustration of how prohibitive these costs can be for the individual concern. The FRA recommended that EU member states should explore ways to support private vessels, in particular fishing vessels, when they face economic loss through their involvement in rescue operations.⁴¹ The issue of compensation for such vessels does not appear to have been addressed by the TFM.

5.4. Safeguard the non-refoulement principle

82. The above cases illustrate how even very recently, and despite assurances to the contrary made to the Committee of Ministers and others, member states continue to effect push-backs.⁴²

83. For the Council of Europe, the issue is clear. In accordance with the judgment of the ECtHR in the case of Hirsi Jamaa and others v. Italy, member states must ensure that people are not pushed back to a country where they risk being treated in violation of Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights. This is in addition to the states' obligation under the SAR Convention.⁴³

84. Since a great number of those intercepted can be presumed to be in need of protection, the place to which they are taken should also allow for them to be able to seek asylum. At the moment, this is definitely not guaranteed in countries such as Libya or Egypt. Moreover, even in Turkey, non-European asylum seekers face difficulties in getting access to protection because of the geographical limitation Turkey maintains with the 1951 Geneva Convention relating to the Status of Refugee.

85. Member states should cease any readmissions, even in the framework of the Dublin Regulation, should the conditions in the country of readmission not be sufficiently protective of the people's human rights and right not to be sent back to a country where they would face persecutions or inhuman and degrading treatment. The case of the agreement between Italy and Libya is a clear example which prevents migrants from departing from Libya (where their human rights are seriously violated) and getting access to protection in Europe.

86. The new Frontex rules allow for returns to the third countries of people intercepted on the high seas following a cursory assessment of protection needs and the situation in the country to which they would be returned. According to HRW, such interceptions and push-backs only contribute to the continuing cycle of migrants and asylum seekers attempting the dangerous crossing.

5.5. Trace the dead and restore family links

87. The Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights had first called in 2007 for the identification of those migrants who die or disappear at sea. The EU in its 2009 Stockholm Declaration made a commitment to improve the recording and identification of migrants trying to reach Europe. Yet, this issue until recently has had little public discussion.

88. While considerable effort is put into identifying those who succeed in reaching the European shores, for the purpose of immigration regulation and asylum determination, it seems that little action has been taken by member states in regard to those who do not. So many individuals continue to perish and their families are unaware of what has become of them. Few families are in a position to pursue the matter themselves. In some cases, the country of origin, if alerted, might use the information to put family members still at home under pressure. This exercise must therefore be handled with utmost care and compassion.

89. In November 2013, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), together with the Italian Red Cross and Milan University took up the issue, convening a First Conference on the management and identification of unidentified decedents, with an emphasis on dead migrants: the experience of European Mediterranean countries. The purpose was to raise awareness about this humanitarian tragedy, share information about current practices in Italy, Spain, Greece, Malta, France and Portugal, and promote best practices at national and regional levels.

90. I support the ICRC's recommendations to develop common forensic protocols and standards, along with the creation of a European database of unidentified decedents retrieved from the Mediterranean and missing persons. Information should be easily available to the families of victims, in order for relatives to come to terms with the loss.

91. The ICRC's activities have generally been related to collecting the Tracing Requests by the relatives in order to try to re-establish the link between separated members of a family. In this context, I support ICRC's recommendation for authorities to maintain and restore family links. "Secondary separation" of family members during rescue operations or at a later stage, for medical reasons for example, should be avoided. In case it is not possible, families should be informed of the whereabouts of their relatives.

92. For the Council of Europe, this is an important issue. Were these people to have died in battle or on land, all efforts would be made to identify them and notify their families. It cannot be that their situation as irregular migrants excludes them from equal consideration.

⁴³ International Convention on Maritime Search and Rescue (SAR), 27 April 1979.

5.6. Monitor maritime practices

93. The IMO should take a role in disseminating and promoting the right application of maritime law. The IMO informed me that oversight of its Conventions, hitherto voluntary, would become mandatory from January 2015, in view to guarantee a better implementation of IMO instruments. However as these audits will be limited to checking if the national implementing systems are in place, the actual application of the rules will not be audited. It is recommendable that member states of IMO extend its mandate in this regard.

94. On 1st July 2006, amendments to the SOLAS and SAR Conventions entered in force placing obligations on states to cooperate and coordinate in a view to disembark persons rescued at sea to a place of safety as soon as possible. This still causes excessive delays in letting people go ashore. The 2004 IMO Guidelines on the Treatment of Persons Rescue at Sea defines – unlike the SAR Convention - a place of safety⁴⁴, and states the need for governments and responsible RCC to “make every effort to minimize the time survivors remain aboard the assisting ship”.

95. Yet, a clear duty for member states to disembark the persons rescued is still missing. Moreover, the IMO guidelines are not binding and states such as Malta have not accepted the IMO Guidelines and still distinguish a safe place in terms of SAR and a safe place in terms of humanitarian law. The Salamis incident illustrates well how weak the International and EU legal framework still is regarding member states' disembarkation duties.

96. As I was informed in a letter from IMO of 7 February 2012, IMO took the initiative to help drafting a non-binding Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) on procedures to facilitate the disembarkation of the persons rescued in the Mediterranean Sea.⁴⁵ Its objective is to improve the coordination of participating governments with regard to the provision of suitable ports or places of safety for survivors, as quickly as possible. It wouldn't create further obligations on State parties. By June 2013, in further correspondence, IMO informed that the consideration of a regional MoU had not been yet successful and that the drafting was still ongoing.

97. It is highly recommendable that the IMO further mediates between Malta and Italy to achieve an agreement through a bilateral MoU for instance, on the SAR and disembarkation responsibilities. Between 2009 and 2010 MoUs on SAR Regions and coordination of SAR services have been already signed by Italy and some of its Mediterranean neighbours (Croatia, Hellenic Republic, Albania, Slovenia) and notified to the IMO. The achievement of a similar agreement between Italy and Malta would certainly be a highly important and promising step. The EU should consider how to facilitate and promote the accomplishment of this bilateral MoU.

⁴⁴ According to the 2004 IMO Guidelines on the Treatment of Persons Rescue at Sea, a place of safety “is a location where rescue operations are considered to terminate. It is also a place where the survivors' safety of life is no longer threatened and where their basic human needs (such as food, shelter and medical needs) can be met. Further it is a place from which transportation arrangements can be made for the survivors' next or final destination.” This definition was taken again by the May 2014 Frontex rules which go further by adding the need to take “into account the protection of their fundamental rights in compliance with the principle of non-refoulement”.

Appendix I - Selection of official replies sent to the Rapporteur

Letter from Mr Richard Froh, Deputy Assistant Secretary General, Operations Directorate of NATO, to Ms Strik, rapporteur of the Committee on Migration, Refugees and Displaced Persons, dated 23 April 2012

Many thanks for your letter of 12 April to Ambassador Evans seeking additional information regarding last year's tragic migrant boat incident in the Mediterranean. I agree with your report's conclusion that this tragedy appears to have been the result of an unfortunate sequence of events, in some ways caused by an apparent lack of communication between many of those involved. If there was a missed opportunity to help on our part, we deeply regret it. But it is clear that the primary responsibility for this tragedy lies with the Gadhafi government authorities, human traffickers and the captain of the boat, all of whom put in danger the lives of the innocent people on-board this vessel. The Commanders of all Allied vessels, whether under NATO command or not, are fully aware of their obligations under maritime law. These obligations apply to all vessels, their crew and captains, be they military or merchant fleet.

NATO and Allies continue to actively review our records in order to ascertain what happened during the two weeks this boat was at sea. This work is ongoing, but in the meantime, I thought it important to get back to you with as much information as we have been able to gather, in advance of the Council of Europe's Parliamentary Assembly's debate on 24 April.

NATO does not hold any satellite imagery that could help identify military, merchant or other ships in the area of interest during the time in question. This is because satellite imagery was not used by NATO to develop Maritime Situational Awareness in support of our UN-mandated embargo operation. This is because satellite capacity is limited and in most cases cannot provide a continuous real time picture. I would also stress that NATO did not declare a "military zone" in the Mediterranean and, as you know, had no overall coordination role for Search and Rescue Operations in the area.

The primary mission of our naval task force was to prevent the flow of weapons to Libya, enforcing the UN arms embargo, a task that we accomplished successfully, despite coming under fire on many occasions from pro-Ghadafi forces. At the time of this incident in late March, only eight vessels in the Mediterranean were under NATO command, covering an operations area of over 61,000 square nautical miles. They actively complied with all their obligations under international law, particularly SOLAS.

I can confirm that helicopters from ships under NATO command were flying in the general area of the migrant boat, including on the 27th of March. However, there is no data that we have, linking one of those helicopters under NATO command to the time and location when survivors reported that they were given water and biscuits. I have asked nations to tell me if any of their helicopters in that part of the Mediterranean during those two weeks had the words "army" or "armee" inscribed on them. Of course not only warships under NATO command, engaged in embargo operations, were operating helicopters in the area at that time. Rotary and fixed wing aircraft from Allies, non-NATO countries and non-military organizations were also active.

Further to the information already provided in Ambassador Evans letter dated 27th of March 2012 regarding the distance of other NATO vessels operating in the same area, I can confirm that the Spanish frigate "Mendez Nunez", under NATO Command, was approximately 24 nautical miles away. The Spanish authorities have also confirmed to me that the frigate's helicopter was on deck, not airborne, at the time mentioned by the survivors. It is essential to note that the relative position of any vessel to the estimated position of the subject vessel in the draft PACE Report is of minimal relevance to the issue, as no distress event had been instigated from a NATO perspective during that time period. Also and as referred above, many other vessels, non-NATO and civilian, were also operating in or transiting through the area.

In his letter, Ambassador Evans also provided you information on Italian ships operating in that part of the Mediterranean. The Italian authorities have made very clear to us that no Italian vessel or aircraft (including helicopters) ever came into contact with the migrant boat. According to them, this includes the ITS Borsini that was 37 nautical miles away from the position given in your report. Nor did the ITS Borsini ever receive a distress call concerning the boat.

We appreciate the Parliamentary Assembly's engagement on the important issue of the loss of migrant life in the Mediterranean and look forward to seeing the final resolution of the Assembly. In the meantime, NATO Allies are already taking the draft recommendations seriously. NATO is examining ways by which we could strengthen our information sharing and procedures related to Search and Rescue at Sea during NATO-led operations. Again, as mentioned by Ambassador Evans, throughout our arms embargo operation last year, NATO ships and aircraft directly assisted in the rescue of over 600 people, including in the days before and after this incident. As well, through coordination with national authorities, we assisted in the rescue of hundreds more. As a matter of procedure, NATO notified the responsible national coastguard as well as the IOM and the UNHCR when boats in distress were sighted. Finally, NATO is undertaking a comprehensive lessons learned process to review to all aspects of our operation in Libya, including the Search and Rescue issues identified in your report.

I hope this additional information will further assist you in your deliberations. We will send along additional information as soon as we receive it from nations or our military command channels.

Letter from Mr Nick Harvey, Minister of State for the Armed Forces of the United Kingdom, to Ms Strik, rapporteur of the Committee on Migration, Refugees and Displaced Persons, dated 2 May 2012

Thank you for your letter to the Defence Secretary regarding the Council of Europe's investigations concerning the loss of lives on a vessel in the Mediterranean Sea.

I would first like to apologise for the delay in our response. This was caused through our misunderstanding. Despite writing to us last October, your letter was only received in mid-February and, having already channelled national information through NATO, we believed that our input had been incorporated into NATO's response that was published on 8 February.

I would like to emphasise the importance with which the United Kingdom takes its responsibilities. We also wholly support the need for transparency. All of our military vessels operating at sea are fully aware of their obligations under maritime law to render assistance to those in distress. To help with your investigation, we have checked our national records for the position of our ships in the region against the dates, times and locations specified for the vessel in your letter. Our records show that no UK military assets either saw or made contact with the stricken vessel in question. This is irrespective of whether these assets were under national, NATO or other command and control arrangements at the time.

We remain fully supportive of your investigation in the hope and expectation that lessons can be learned from this tragic incident.

Letter from Mr Giampaolo Di Paolo, Minister of Defence of Italy, to Ms Strik, rapporteur of the Committee on Migration, Refugees and Displaced Persons, dated 10 May 2012

I refer to your letter of 4 April 2012 requesting further information concerning the "distress calls" involving the Borsini which was operating in the Mediterranean, and the activities of the aircraft on board.

In this connection, I would inform you that the Borsini received no distress call signal either through the automatic system or its radio equipment on board. Furthermore, there was no flight by the helicopter on board on 27 March 2011. The following day, it carried out a single air-sea surveillance flight, spotting a vessel sailing towards Lampedusa, in respect of which action was taken by officers from the Financial and Customs Police and the Lampedusa port authorities.

Letter from Mr Richard Froh, Deputy Assistant Secretary General, Operations Directorate of NATO, to Ms Strik, rapporteur of the Committee on Migration, Refugees and Displaced Persons, dated 12 September 2012

Doc.

Thank you for your letter of 18 May wherein you asked for further technical clarification regarding the tragic loss of life during the migrant boat incident in the Mediterranean in March 2011, which you have been investigating. I will address each of your questions in turn.

First, regarding communications on board military vessels during NATO operations, please be informed that not all such vessels are necessarily equipped with a Global Maritime Distress and Safety System (GMDSS), in any of its versions, or have the means to receive Hydrolant messages. NATO has standards for tactical communications systems which vessels must have when operating as part of a NATO-led force on operations or during training and exercises. These standards do not include requirements for civilian communications systems such as INMARSAT, on military vessels.

Second, as mentioned by Ambassador Evans in his letter of 27 March 2012, NATO's Maritime Command Naples did receive a copy of the fax from the Rome Maritime Rescue Coordination Centre (IVIRCC) at 2139 hours on 27 March 2011. As I said in my response to your first letter, based on the form and content of that fax, it was not judged to be a distress call. Therefore the watch staff passed along the information in the fax to the NATO Operational Commander on board ITS ETNA, via military tactical communications systems, as a routine matter. Standard practice in such cases is not to record the date and time messages are sent, and acknowledgments of receipt are not requested. These types of exchanges are considered 'non-accountable'. The Italian authorities have confirmed to me that ITS ETNA received the information from Maritime Command Naples and forwarded it to the ships under its command. But the Italians are not able to confirm that any or all of the ships under ITS ETNA's command received this information. The Spanish authorities have confirmed that their vessel ESPS Mendez-Nunez did not receive this information nor do they have any record of receiving the Rome MRCC information from ITS ETNA. Nonetheless, on the morning of 28 March 2011, the Mendez Nunez conducted a search in an area 60nm north of Tripoli with its helicopter, following an instruction received on the morning of 28 March from the ITS ETNA. Unfortunately, the helicopter did not find the boat in question. Had we located the boat we would have rescued those in need as NATO vessels have done on numerous occasions during last year's Libya operation, and since then - most recently when NATO vessels assisted in the rescue of more than 50 migrants off the Italian coast in the area of Lampedusa last week.

Regarding your third question, Maritime Command Naples did not receive any further messages from MRCC Rome on the boat in question. After being queried, nations as well have informed me that none of their ships received any such messages.

Finally, I can confirm that NATO did not use satellite imagery to monitor maritime traffic during Operation Unified Protector or to create a Recognized Maritime Picture (RMP). As to your request for copies of the RMP for areas of interest to your investigation on certain days, I am not able to provide them, as they do not exist. NATO's current RMP tool is used by tactical and operational commanders during an operation. It can accurately depict the position of military vessels in real time but in its current form has no 'recording' capability that would allow us to retain historical records.

In closing let me say that we have taken good note of the information provided in your very thorough investigation. We are using it as an input to our Lessons Learned process for Operation Unified Protector. As I mentioned before, when we complete that process, I would be happy to share our related findings with you. Like you, our goal is to improve how we work, so that - to the maximum extent possible - such loss of life can be avoided in the future.

After four exchanges with you, I can confirm that there is no further information available through our chain of military command or through national channels that has been offered to us at NATO Headquarters regarding this tragic incident.

I wish you all the very best in your future work.

Letter from Mr Alejandro Alvargonzález San Martín, Secretary General for Defence Policy of Spain, to Ms Strik, rapporteur of the Committee on Migration, Refugees and Displaced Persons, dated 21 September 2012

I am pleased to answer your letter you sent to Minister of Defence, Mr Pedro Morenés, regarding the SOLAS incident.

I wish to reiterate that all information sent at the time, without exceptions, is correct and responds to the truth of the facts, as could not be otherwise.

I can ratify that Frigate Mendez Nunez did not receive a fax or any other communication in relation to the incident of 27 March 2011. An ITS ETNA instruction was received at 1158A hours in the morning of 28 March 2011, leading to a 60 nautical miles search to the North of Tripoli, area which includes the coordinates you mention in your report. The helicopter did not observe the presence of any vessels there.

These data, as well as any further information you require on the incident, are found in the letter that Mr Richard Froh (NATO Deputy Assistant Secretary General for Operations) sent you last 12 September.
